Ever since mankind first walked the earth, its relationship with nature has been one that can only be described as complicated.

After all, it is a fact that as the human population grows, its ever-increasing demands will push nature towards exhaustion.

One may argue that in some aspects, humanity is an affront to nature and that we are something akin to parasites gnawing on the roots of a mighty tree.

After all, there is a sense of dismay that has to be expressed when one sees previously rolling hills and lush forests replaced with glimmering towers and dense neighbourhoods.

In reality, humans and nature are quite capable of co-existing, and perhaps, may even mutually benefit from each other's existence.

Maybe in the future, buildings, icons of humanity's progress, will rise surrounded by lush greenery, as a symbol of the compromise between humans and nature.

Archixcaping is a two-man show featuring the two highly distinct themes, with one artist focused on buildings and the other on natural landscapes.

Born and raised in Kuala Lumpur, the 27-year-old Izzuddin Basiron has been immersing himself in the art world for the past two years.

Given his upbringing in the city, it is not all that surprising that buildings and human structures are what he knows best.

In the past, architecture appealed to him, but art and photography soon proved far more appealing to the young man.

Combining these desires together, Izzuddin continues to create art by capturing the essence of urban life.

His exhibition will show what his eyes saw as a child, and will reveal that like every tree out there, every building is distinct, with its own unique structures.

While the city is often congested with few people willing to keep their eyes off the ground, Izzuddin hopes to help people realise that there is colour even in the bleakest of human cities.

On the other side of the gallery are the works of the 26-year-old Shahnaz Azlin, who has always been close to nature since his upbringing in rural Kedah.

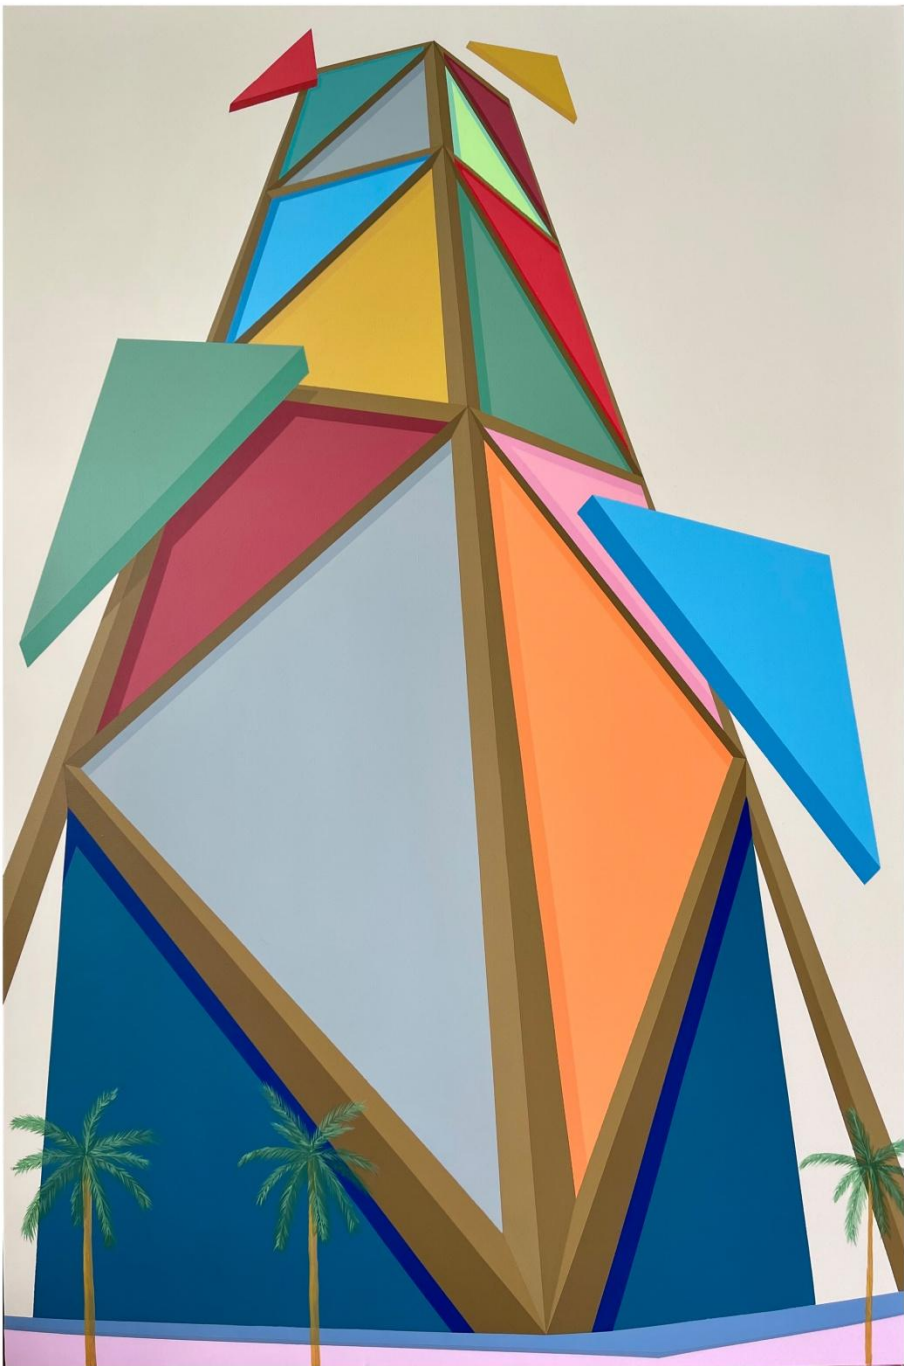

Nature affects his mood and this is reflected in his artwork's texture, surface and colour, which in turn speak volumes of his work and dreams of the future.

While nature can indeed be bright and colourful, Shahnaz often begins his works with dark and sombre colours, in tune with his emotion.

Just as nature can be filled with complexities and surprises, the same can be said for Shahnaz and his works.

Shahnaz believes that like nature, life has its struggles and uncertainties and his artworks offer the discerning eye an insight into the wild and dangerous path that the artist must take.
